

From the principal

Thankyou to the families who took up the opportunity last week to discuss their child's progress.

Did you know that parents have a massive impact on their children's educational success? In fact, research shows that parental engagement is crucial for children and young people's cognitive, social and emotional development.

One way to show both teachers and your child that you are interested in their education is attending what are commonly referred to as 'parent-teacher interviews' but may be better called parent-teacher discussions. These sessions, which are offered twice per year, are an ideal opportunity to discover more about your child's academic, emotional and social progress, and to share information about your child with his or her teachers.

Going along shows your child that you are interested in their education. It also provides deeper insight than a school report can provide about their strengths and interests, areas where they could improve and what you can do to help them achieve their full potential.

happy holidays!

The fourth instalment of battles that we believe are worth having. May your battles be gently won!

Argue for honesty

We cannot assume that kids will always be honest with us. Lying is a naturally acquired skill to avoid conflict and difficulty. If you want honesty, you must argue for it, role model it, and teach it.

You teach honesty by practicing when they are young with simple things like, 'Have you brushed your teeth?' It is easy to check and easy to reward. If you don't argue for honesty at that level, you cannot expect an honest answer down the track to, "Were you drinking alcohol at the party last night?"

Honesty from all parties leads to open communication and trust. That trust is essential.

Your kids need to know that even if they tell you something you really don't want to hear, you will listen and you will support them. This doesn't mean there will be no consequences, but it does mean you will be a safe harbour.
